I'm reading Benjamin Hale's The Significance of Liberal Justice for Contemporary Philosophy. In the book he argues that the bond of justice is between an individual and society. Specifically, the argument goes, we are obligated to be morally good in order to benefit others. For example, if you perform a good deed for the greater good of the public, you have one or more obligations towards society. These obligations are essentially a carryover from the original obligation of being morally good. This leads me to an "obligation to be morally good." Does that mean a moral agent has an obligation to be a good person, or is a moral agent obligated to be a good person within a society? There are many people in the world. Each of them has the right to do as he or she pleases. In other words, an individual doesn't have to be morally good to do whatever he or she wants, so long as you don't harm another person. In that case, what exactly is this obligation to be morally good? A: First, Hale is using the concept of the bond of justice in a slightly different way than I would. For me, there is a bond of justice between the state/city/country and a citizen or resident that allows her the right to things like police protection, freedom of movement, good schools, etc. Those things are not owed to you personally, but the state by which you are governed is
